It is doubtless very gratifying to editor Watterson and his paper to have compliment as to say that the next national administration will not deal patronage, without first consulting said editor and said paper. However, the undisputed facts remain that Mr. Cleveland was nominated despite the violent opposition of both and swept the country without the hearty support of either Under the circumstances it does not look reasonable that the President should consult an organ which, after all, is only one among a hundred.

A PROPER VIEW OF THE ROAD QUESTION

What we want all over the country good roads, built on the best principle and kept in good repair, and free to all the privilege of working out his tax up on the roads. Because a man is a minor should not excuse him from a public burcourt-house or a poor-house, we must keep them up, because the public use them and we are all the public. But the present system of taking the poor men who have neither horse nor wagon nor house, nor land, and putting them upon the road and working them day after day on a road that they will probably never use, is outrageous. The more so when the rich land-owner, through whose land the road runs, is excused because of some disability.
